

The Copyright Society of the U.S.A. is a non-profit corporation organized in 1953. Its mission is to foster interest in and advance the study of copyright law and of rights in literature, music, art, the theater, motion pictures, television and other forms of intellectual property, including computer programs, architectural works and other works of authorship. The Society's membership includes individuals, business organizations, law firms and associations involved in or affected by copyright, including those based on new technologies for creating and using copyrightable works.

The Society is governed by officers and a Board of Trustees consisting of outstanding members of the copyright community in business, education, government and the practice and teaching of law. Its primary functions are to gather, disseminate and exchange information concerning rights in intellectual property, to promote a better understanding of copyright and the vital importance of the legal and economic protection of intellectual property generally.
